Mt. Vernon PTA Hears Civil Defense Lecture

In case of an atomic attack a conservative estimate of the number of people the Mt. Vernon area would have to take care of might be 45,000 the Mt. Vernon Parent Teachers Association was told at their regular meeting, Monday night, in the school library.

Capt. Donald H. Smith, Civil Defense Liaison Officer and Provost Marshal of the Blue Grass Ordnance Depot at Richmond, to name a few of his titles, discussed a probable course of events in case of an atomic attack.

He stressed the point that his information came from Col. Leon T. Reid, State Civil Defense Director. Capt. Smith told the group that Mt. Vernon would most likely be out of the "Radio-active fallout area." Probable targets nearest this area would be Louisville, Cincinnati and Knoxville. The main problem in Rockcastle County would be decontaminating, feeding and keeping order among refugees that would flow from the stricken areas.

and I've earned one week's cost of cooking electrically!"

"My wages for the time to check out three well-filled market carts pay for a week's operation of my electric range," says Mrs. Stanley Curtis of 740 Lynne Drive, Lexington, Ky.

"I welcome bargains, and electricity is the biggest bargain I know of. Electric help at home is certainly a blessing, too, after a busy day at the store."

"I'm as keen about electricity as Mom," says daughter, Rosmary, pictured at left with her mother at the electric range. "With Mom working, us kids pitch in, and my job is getting dinner started. And, gee, it's easy and foolproof with our automatic electric range. Cool and clean, too, and I feel safer somehow because it's flameless. When I get married, you can bet I'll keep right on cooking electrically."

Farm And Home News

BY H. Lee Durham and Martha Owen
County Extension Agents

Farm Information

Let's talk about how to use farm information sources more wisely. Where can we get the best information to guide us in our farming? All of us nowadays must get information from other people to help us in doing our own jobs well.

Our physicians must depend on what they can learn from other physicians and from medical research. Our scientists and engineers have reported in technical papers, in conferences and in books. As a county agent, depend on research workers and specialists at the University of Kentucky and other universities, on reports of research, bulletins and magazines, and on what you farm people tell me. More and more as a farmer you must depend on technical specialists for information which will enable you to make the best decisions in your farming operations. Today, there are more than a dozen different sources of farm information used by farmers. These include newspapers, radio, television, farm papers, the Extension Agent, Soil Conservation Service, representatives of Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation, vocational agriculture, salesmen and dealers in farm supplies, and other farmers.

The biggest problem each farmer has, therefore, is not in finding someone to give him help and advice, but in finding the right one for the particular problem at the right time.

Research with Kentucky farmers shows that the most successful farmers in general get farm information from a larger number of different sources than do less successful farmers. There are two main reasons why getting information from a wide variety of different sources is helpful. In the first place the more different persons, agencies, or avenues that you have frequent contact with, the more likely it is that you will hear by chance about a new idea or practice that you can use to good advantage in your own farming operations. In other words by having contact with many sources you tend to increase your opportunities to learn about things that will be useful to you.

The second reason, and perhaps the most important one, why using a variety of farm information sources is helpful, is that you can be more selective in getting information from the source that can provide the most useful information. For instance, you can get timely farming tips and a limited amount of information about many new farming ideas by listening to informative radio programs, reading the farm page of newspapers, or reading farm magazines. But since these programs and articles are prepared for large numbers of farmers whose farm situations differ, the specific details you may need are often omitted.

For information and advice on the applicability of a particular practice to your situation, you must turn to other sources. No farmer, of course, needs to be told to check with his neighbors about their experience with a new variety of seed, or a new method of livestock breeding. But, for an increasing number of new farm practices specialized technical skill is required which only agricultural specialists in the Extension Service, Soil Conservation Service, or other agencies can provide. The most successful farmers maintain regular contact with representatives of these agencies for the purpose of obtaining the most specialized information and advice available. It really pays off.

"Stamped" Several times each year, people ask if any chemical is available that will cause tree stumps to rot out quickly. There may be such a material, but if so I do not know of any research that has proved its effectiveness.

Stumps can be dug, pulled or bulldozed out, blasted loose, or cut out by a stump cutter, that many landscaping contractors use in some of the larger towns. These processes—all featuring mechanical removal - are better and faster, but may be somewhat costly or not feasible.

An alternative method that will work reasonably well is to cut the stump as nearly flush with the ground as possible. Then spread a coating of fertilizer (1-6-4 or similar) about 1/2-inch thick over the cut surface of the stump, and cover this with about four to six inches of dirt. Keep it constantly moist, particularly during the warm seasons to hasten natural decay, and in 2 or 3 years you can break up the stump with a mattock or similar tool. The top part of the stump will then be eliminated and the area can be leveled off.

During the two or three years when the stump is rotting, the raised area can be used as a flower bed.

Grounding Electrical Equipment

Metal frames of all electrical equipment should be grounded, says County Agent, H. Lee Durham, as a safety device for farm workers.

"Grounding" is the process by which electricity can be passed harmlessly into the ground rather than through the bodies of equipment users.

Much new equipment has an extra wire for grounding. This wire runs out the side of the cord plug or to the third prong of the plug. It should be securely fastened to a ground connection when the equipment is being used. Ground connections are such things as cold water pipes running underground, or an eight-foot pipe driven into moist soil. Grounding is important in shops having damp concrete or earthen floors.

Much older equipment does not have the extra grounding cord. But this does not mean they are safe without it. If there is no three-wire grounding prong, use a pair of battery clamps and a length of No. 16 or No. 18 copper wire. Clamp one end of the wire to the equipment and the other end to a grounded water pipe or the ground terminal of the electrical outlet box.

All repairs operating at 240 volts should be permanently grounded. Professional electricians can show how this should be done. It involves using a third (neutral) wire with the 240-volt leads and connecting it to the frame and to a solid 8-foot ground rod driven into moist earth.

Protecting Trees And Shrubs From Rabbit Damage

Last winter rabbits caused serious damage to trees and shrubs. The unusually large amount of damage was due to heavy snows in late winter which hid the rabbits' usual food supply. Even if snows are not heavy, each year rabbits damage trees and shrubs by nipping off shoots, branches, leaves and buds. Gnawing and peeling off bark is common on small apple trees. One rabbit can ruin a large number of plants within a short time.

Protection against them is necessary in order to start an orchard or operate a nursery successfully. Without some control measures, a young planting of apple trees can be quickly destroyed; likewise, nursery stock can also be destroyed within a short period of time. Young apple trees are frequently protected by wire guards or tar paper. Black tar paper or 1/2-inch wire mesh cut into strips 12" x 24" can be wrapped around each tree.

Repellents are suggested for protecting nursery stock. Many chemicals are available in the form of pellets. One chemical that has been found to be the most effective is Thiram. A number of formulations are sold under various trade names with Thiram being the active ingredient.

New is a good time to apply repellents to protect shrubs and trees. They can be applied with a brush or sprayer. Apply thoroughly to the trunk of the tree or shrub from the base to a point high enough on the trunk to be out of reach of the rabbits. Deep snows will enable rabbits to feed higher on the plants than when the ground is bare. Remember when using repellents to apply the material according to directions on the label.

Additional information on repellents, their preparation, and application can be found in USDA leaflet No. 396, "Protecting Trees and Shrubs from Rabbit Damage". This can be obtained by writing to the Superintendent of Documents, U. S. Government Printing Office, Washington 25, D. C., or to the Bulletin Room, Agricultural Experiment Station, University of Kentucky, Lexington.
